The school is lying to you. Your parents. Everyone, pretty much. I used to believe their stories that the future was made during your school days. It isn't. The future is malleable, life is long, and there's always time to retrain and do more. Studying science won't make you a scientist any more than studying sport will make you a professional footballer; and studying English and economics sure as hell won't make you a journalist.

By age 4, children know the difference between telling the truth and lying — and they know it's wrong to lie. So, generally, they're truthful, and when they're not it's obvious. But they also become more proficient at lying because they're more cognitively capable of taking into account the listener's belief of their statement.
