Liminality is a logical transition for tourists since they are leaving the comfort of home to travel crossing in time and space some threshold or boundary to some unknown experience. This frequently reflects the period and space in the anticipation and travel to and from different phases of the experience (Clawson and Knetsch, 1966; White and White, 2004; Light 2009; and Lew, 2012).

"The liminal has become a popular way of interpreting the experiences of travel from airports to train travel. Few give an explicit discussion of the meanings and origins of this term – this book does. To this end, [Liminal Landscapes] is a helpful addition to understanding the affective state of movement." Journal of Transport Geography 28 ...

Liminal landscapes are found at the fringes, at the limits. However, there is more to it than that. Had we just been talking about the peripheral, or the far-away, we would be dealing with marginality; that which is the furthest away from the centre. Liminal landscapes are in-between spaces. Seascides and beaches are archetypical liminal landscapes.

In 2009 French authorities demolished and cleared an informal shelter in Calais known as "the Jungle". British national press constructed this as a rational response to the problem of illegal migration. Crucial to this justification was the metaphoric use "The Jungle" to describe the descent into anarchic degradation which spilt out into surrounding spaces of civility.
