Determining factors
have included areas that offered defensive
advantages, resources
such as metals, salt, and
fossil fuels, and
locations on trading routes. In modern times

of cities-and
suburbanization, the
return to the countryside
and the growth of
commuter towns, are both examined.

The factor which affects the growth of the population in the biggest
way is the fertility rate.

The fertility rate is typically measured by the number of children per one woman of child-bearing age. If the fertility rate is larger than 2, the rule of thumb is that the population should rise, as there are more children than their parents.
