Appellation "Black Prince" Edward is often referred to as the "Black Prince". The first known source to use the sobriquet "Black Prince" was the antiquary John Leland in the 1530s or early 1540s (about 165 years after the death of the Black Prince). Leland mentions the sobriquet in two manuscript notes in the 1530s or early 1540s, with the implication that it was by that date in relatively widespread use.

BBC - History - Edward, the Black Prince

The Black Prince, for example, is a remarkable work that fuses story, poetry, philosophy, psychology into a pulsing fire of creative magic. It reads like a thriller - it is a thriller, in one sense - but no hack thriller writer ever digressed in the way Murdoch does to discuss art, love, marriage, life, men and women; the Black Prince is, however, "unputdownable."
