The Making of Terrorism, Wieviorka, White

In essence, Wieviorka argues, the dynamics of terrorism, whether they operate within a single state or across multiple states, remain the same: to the extent that the actors employing the violence remain connected both socially and ideologically to those in whose name they are fighting one can speak of political violence but not of terrorism which implies the radical disengagement by the terrorist actor from the social, national or communal movement in whose name he or she acts.

Georgetown University's Fathali Moghaddam, who specializes in intergroup relations and conflict, describes the making of a terrorist as a staircase where each successive floor is characterized by specific ways of thinking. On the ground floor, individuals are disgruntled because they feel deprived and have particular perceptions of fairness.

The Making of Terrorism in Pakistan: Historical and Social ...

In our coverage of terrorism, we rely strongly on data from the Global Terrorism Database (GTD), which defines terrorism as “acts of violence by non-state actors, perpetrated against civilian populations, intended to cause fear, in order to achieve a political objective.” 4, 5 Its definition excludes violence initiated by governments (state terrorism) and open combat between opposing armed forces, even if they’re non-state actors.
