Urban experiences are diverse and dynamic, changing often with advances in technology, shifts in capital investment, and migrations of people. They are shaped by power and wealth, as well as ingenuity and labor. Urbanity is layered with cultural and social histories, and the demands of day-to-day living. Getting from place to place puts a city dweller in contact with a stimulating variety of people and material

The Industrial Revolution was a key foundation of transforming cities and the urban experience. Europeans faced issues such as pollution, health, disease, poverty, and crime.

Factories were shaped identically along the riverside. This resulted in the first generation of pollution. As this development continued, the water became contaminated.
