Cecily is constantly wandering off to the garden to write in her diary or to water flowers, and uses the excuse of watering flowers to avoid her distasteful German lessons. Cecily's joy at escaping into the garden to take care of her beloved blooms and daydream is a good reminder of the simple pleasures that getting out in the garden can bring.

Point of View: Mansfield often conflates her third-person narration with the tone and feelings of her protagonist. This form of narration is called third-person limited. In "The Garden Party," Mansfield imbues the third-person narration with the feelings and thoughts of Laura as we follow her throughout the day.
